

My reasons for wanting reconciliation among all Blessed Families (TM, H1,H2)

Kate Tsubata
June 15, 2017

Here are my reasons for wanting reconciliation among all Blessed Families.

- 1) Division wastes time, people, talents and money. It's a no-brainer.
- 2) The nature of God's providence is the establishment of true love among all people. That's our purpose.
- 3) Blessed families are the "chosen people" of this era, so what we do affects the larger world. Choosing to fight is equivalent to fostering war, massacres, violence, religious violence, in the larger societal settings.
- 4) History and our own legacies. We worked for decades to resolve conflict and build understanding between antagonists. To fail at this is to negate all those efforts.
- 5) Our descendants learn from what we do, not what we believe. The greatest truth in the world, when it isn't lived, becomes another failed utopian ideal.
- 6) There is only one "winner" in the division, and that is the enemy. I refuse to give him the satisfaction.
- 7) I know good and loving and righteous families on all sides of the divides. It's like North and South Korea--good people are being separated. I hate that.
- 8) If we were to somehow, in the midst of all this anger and hate and accusation, find a path to love and inclusion and forgiveness, it would bring great joy to God, humanity and the great ones in the Spirit world.
- 9) If we fail, we will become the worst in all history, because we had the greatest truth and the Blessing, and all the tools to succeed.
- 10) It is totally useless to pray, do conditions, donate, or work for campaigns or witnessing, if done while ignoring the beam in our own eyes. We have ZERO credibility to any issue out there -- racism, political unrest, religious violence, family breakdown--unless we heal our own illness.

Those are my reasons.