

Think the others are doing it wrong? Here's what to do

There is something Father taught us about judgment: that once an example is made and a standard is set, then judgement naturally follows. So judgement is not really achieved with critical words; it is done by setting a better example. And with this kind of judgment, even a competition would be good for all: rather than slinging harsh words at each other, rivals can compete to set a better example.

While this applies to families, siblings and generations, right now we're in an election. So, please, political parties, I invite you - judge each other by setting a better example. Whatever issue you want to address, set the best example of the solution.

Think the others are doing it wrong? The only real way to judge what they are doing is to do it better, by setting a better example. Show them how it's done. Not just with words, but with actions, over time. Something they can do, too. Because a better example can be followed, or not.

In this kind of competition, who loses?
