

Total indemnity (2)

Sun Myung Moon
April 3, 1983
Seoraksan, Korea

June 26, 2005, Washington, DC

From the teacher's point of view, the Japanese people were enemies. He was an enemy both nationally and personally. However, after the defeat of Japan, the teacher loved Japan. They even rescued the Japanese police who were being chased. Do you know why so many young people in Japan are loyal to their teachers with eternal life? This is because it must be rewarded according to the law of causality. It is because we have planted love for the world, transcending nations and according to God's emotional will. It is because it has planted the emotional foundation that leads to the path of loving and living a national enemy.

The Japanese police officers who led the teacher's underground independence movement and tortured him harshly, even though the teacher's words were all shots, but packed their bags and sent them back. Today, you in Japan are prisoners who are obsessed with teachers. He does not even know himself and is obeying the heavenly mandate.

...

Japanese people ought to be my enemies. They subjugated Korea and did many evil things to the Korean people, killing thousands from 1905 to 1945. Nevertheless, I love the Japanese people. When Japan surrendered in World War II, I loved my defeated enemies. This is the reason young Japanese members are now following me at the risk of their lives; it is in accordance with the principle of cause and effect. It is because I established the foundation of heart by loving the enemy nation, Japan, with God's heart, beyond nationalism. The Japanese policemen who beat me nearly to death would have been executed later if I had implicated them. But I forgave them and sent them off to Japan with their luggage.

Moreover, it is a great thing that Japanese members are now shedding tears, sweat, and blood to save the United States, once Japan's enemy.